Don't doubt divergence

By Taylor Schleich & Warren Lovely

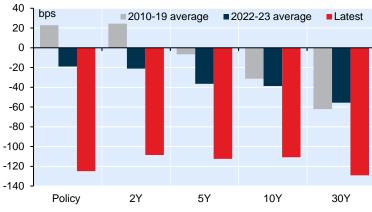

While the world was digesting U.S. election results yesterday, the Bank of Canada sent out Senior Deputy Governor Carolyn Rogers for a speech on the mortgage market. Prepared remarks didn't offer much insight into the policy outlook, but the Q&A gave us a bit more to chew on. When asked on growing rate divergence between Canada and the U.S., Rogers (again) stressed this isn't a binding constraint right now:

"We set our policy rate for the Canadian economy. And there are some clear differences between [the U.S.] economy and our economy right now.... There's been a bit of worry recently about divergence but [while] there's a limit to that divergence, I don't think we're anywhere near that limit now. Over the years, we have seen rates between Canada and the U.S. diverge quite a bit more than they are now."

Clear economic differences? No kidding. While Canadian policy/yield differentials are historically extreme, we agree that this largely reflects ongoing underperformance of Canada's economy. Of course, markets are forward-looking, but relative struggles looks to continue. Momentum in Canada is already muted and an imminent 2-year population detox won't help. Meantime, loose(r) fiscal policy from an incoming Trump administration should add more fuel to an already hot U.S. economy.

Lump on the potential for protectionist trade policies and Canada's growth prospects appear in even greater jeopardy. Unfortunately, that's the reality when a third of your economy is built on exports and three-quarters of this product flows to a single, increasingly isolated, buyer. We'll have more to say here soon.

Having already filled your inbox with research on the Canada-US fiscal imbalance (here, here, here & here), we won't beat a dead horse, but we'll simply say a wider debt gap supports lower yields in Canada too.

To summarize, historically wide rate differentials are justified, poised to grow further and be sustained for longer. Will that lead to a weaker loonie? Yes. But we continue to argue that the impact of 'imported inflation' from a weaker C$ is overstated (see our earlier note). So how far can rates diverge? Rogers says we're not "anywhere close" to the limit, citing larger past divergences. Back in the late 1990s, the BoC's overnight target was 250 bps below the Fed's, which may be the 'limit' that's referred to. We don't see us getting all the way back there but another 25, 50, even 75 bps isn't out of the question. BoC policy will be set based on the Canadian economy and to us, the Canadian economy still needs lower rates, whether or not the U.S. does too.
