Ontario credit rating: Gimme another 'A'

By Warren Lovely

In a move that comes as little surprise, S&P has upgraded Ontario a single notch to AA-. The short-term rating also got a one-notch boost at S&P to the maximum level of A-1+. The outlook—which S&P placed on 'positive' back in June 2023—has been returned to 'stable'.

So it's another 'A' for Ontario. And it means this bellwether credit—accounting for ~40% of all provincial direct and guaranteed bonds—is fully double-A at each of the four primary credit rating agencies. The upgrade follows Ontario's Fall Economic Statement, which revealed broad economic resilience, a relatively stronger budgetary path, incremental progress on the debt burden, an even more manageable interest bite and lower borrowing needs vs. prior guidance. It was clearly credit positive for a province already on 'positive' (link). Cue the S&P move, the rationale for the upgrade thus stated:

"We expect the Province of Ontario will maintain a solid foundation that will help buffer its fiscal outcomes from heightened economic uncertainty. | This expectation is supported by better-than-expected economic growth in Ontario and solid budgetary execution against targets with a commitment to stay on its debt sustainability path. | As a result, S&P Global Ratings raised its long-term issuer credit and senior unsecured debt ratings on Ontario to 'AA-' from 'A+'. At the same time, we raised our short-term issuer credit rating on the province to 'A-1+' from 'A-1'. | The stable outlook reflects that, despite increased economic risk, we project that Ontario will maintain relatively stable budgetary performance, with modest operating surpluses and after-capital deficits of about 7%."

This S&P upgrade could be good news for related entities. For example, OMERS Administration Trust's AA+ long-term rating at S&P is currently on 'positive' outlook. The 'upside scenario' flagged in the latest S&P rating snapshot (from 11-Jun-24) highlighted the potential for an upgrade if Ontario's rating were to be raised. Stay tuned then.

Meantime, the step up at Ontario brings to nine the total number of provincial credit rating upgrades (by all four rating agencies) since the start 2022. If you're counting, Ontario has been boosted twice now,

Alberta securing five upgrades in all, while New Brunswick and Newfoundland have each been lifted once. Against these nine upgrades, there have been two downgrades since the start of 2022 (both levied against British Columbia).

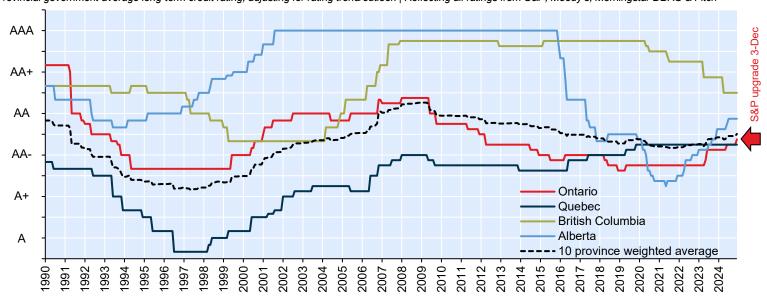

It means that Ontario's average long-term rating has edged ever closer to the weighted provincial average. As for that average provincial rating, it has now moved even further above the pre-COVID level, highlighting a few things: relatively contained provincial credit damage at the peak of the pandemic; material fiscal improvement during the initial stages of recovery; an ongoing commitment (in some provinces) to budgetary repair/debt containment even in the face of economic headwinds, affordability pressures and intense geopolitical uncertainty.

The provincial credit rating landscape has yet to fully stabilize. There remain four 'positive' and two 'negative' outlooks still to be resolved. Among other developments, Ontario could secure another upgrade, with Moody's having the province on 'positive' since May 2023.

Finally, if you're wondering whether the ongoing evolution in provincial credit ratings has any bearing on relative valuations, the answer is most assuredly 'yes'. Where ratings have been in ascendence (including Alberta and Ontario), spreads are relatively tighter. Not surprisingly, the corollary also holds. To us, the generalized convergence in credit ratings across the provinces helps to explain the seemingly limited variation in relative spreads. Refer to our earlier analysis here.

As for a current snapshot... There remains a strong correlation between intrinsic credit risk—which is well-proxied by long-term credit rating scores—and today's provincial bond spreads (both domestic and international). As we've routinely highlighted, build in additional variables to capture relative liquidity, economic/fiscal momentum and the relative borrowing impulse and you will have explained all but the faintest bit of variation in provincial government spreads.
