The new normal for the GoC borrowing program

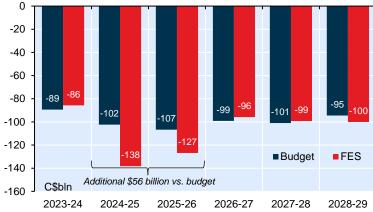

By Taylor Schleich

The fall economic statement released just before the holidays was overshadowed by the political drama that surrounded it. Nonetheless, there were important developments contained in the fiscal update, including for bond investors. The punchline is: the pace of borrowing will step up in the final fiscal quarter. Bills will account for most of the marginal funding, but the bond program won't be spared either. (See our full analysis of the 2024-25 DMS update and broader FES here).

Unfortunately, the DMS update's scope is somewhat limited, only providing exact issuance numbers and a sector-by-sector breakdown for 2024-25 (i.e., through March 31st). So, we don't exactly know what the 2025-26 program will look like, but elements of the fiscal update can give us an idea. Indeed, an upwardly revised 2025-26 financial requirement suggests that larger borrowing needs won't be contained to the next three months. Rather, the $69 billion of bonds due to be auctioned between January and March (up from $56 billion in earlier quarters) is close to the new run rate. For the full fiscal year then, we're looking at somewhere in the neighbourhood of $280 billion which would be good for a third straight year-on-year increase.

Chart 3: Next 3 months may be the new normal for issuance Gross GoC bond issuance by fiscal year, quarter

When it comes to net supply, that's also due to step up. Add in the BoC's balance sheet normalization and we're talking about ~$150 billion that needs to be absorbed by end investors in 2025-26. Note that even though QT is likely to end in 2025 (as we wrote recently), it doesn't mean the BoC will be back to buying bonds next year. Earlier communications suggest reserves will be stabilized via term repos and bill purchases at first with bond buying at auction restarting later.

Of course, we should stress that Canada's federal political situation is fluid. Polls suggest that any prospective vote could produce a change in government, which could in turn produce a change in fiscal priorities which would impact borrowing. Regardless, this should have a relatively small impact on supply next year with scope for more material changes in 2026-27 and beyond. The economic backdrop is also uncertain, and the economic implications of a tit-for-tat tariff war could also produce a borrowing impact. So yes, there may be larger than normal confidence bands on these estimates but we'd consider this the 'status quo' path for GoC bond supply over the next year.
